Fly-grazing on bridleways

The

Fly-grazing is the unlawful grazing of horses (and other animals) on land without permission of the landowner. Such land may include the verges of tarmac roads or unsurfaced roads, byways and bridleways (highways), commons and open space. The presence of loose or tethered horses on public highways can be particularly dangerous for riders and carriage-drivers (equestrians) and may prevent them from using it. There are instances of fly-grazed horses being stallions, so equestrians should always be wary.

This advice note addresses fly-grazing on highways and how it affects riders and carriage-drivers. For welfare concerns regarding abandoned or fly-grazing horses or fly-grazing on land without public rights of way, see BHS Welfare.

What to do about fly-grazing on highways

In England and Wales, the police and local authorities have powers to remove horses left on bridleways, byways and roads (highways). Fly-grazed horses on highways should always be reported to the police and the highway authority with a request for action, explaining the danger posed by the horses to users of the highway. Authorities may not have officers with specific responsibility, so where there is doubt, it should be reported to the Chief Executive. The highway authority will be the county council if the area has borough or district councils as well as a county council, or the council if it is a unitary authority area (only one council doing all tasks).

Where horses are preventing use of a highway or increasing the risk of using it, you should also copy the report to the council officer responsible for public rights of way. If the horses are not preventing use of the highway, the authority has a power, but not necessarily a duty (requirement), to act. Where the horses are endangering users or preventing use of the highway, the authority is required to act because the horses are an obstruction, which is a criminal offence. The authority has a duty, defined in the Highways Act 1980 Section 130, to “assert and protect” the right of the public to use the right of way. In this respect, fly-grazing is an obstruction, in the same way as a locked gate.

What may happen

Best results are achieved in areas where there is zero-tolerance to fly-grazing and a coordinated joint approach between the landowner, the police and the local authority, and also within the local authority – potentially trading standards (for horses without microchip or passport); public rights of way/highways; the officer responsible for stray, loose or abandoned animals; and a traveller liaison officer (these roles are not defined in all authorities).

Landowners are liable for the welfare of any horses left on their land, and for any incident arising from one of those horses straying onto a highway or endangering a highway user, so they are usually keen to achieve an early solution. The National Farmers' Union and Country Landowners' Association have advice for their members and the action they may take.

The highway authority may be the landowner of a public bridleway, byway or road, or the landowner may not be defined if the way is ancient and separated from land to each side by fences, hedges or walls. The surface layer of any highway is 'vested in' the highway authority irrespective of who owns the land, so it has a responsibility for what happens to that surface, as well as a responsibility to keep the highway clear and usable in safety.

The highway authority should serve notice on the owner of the animals to remove them, either directly if the owner is known, or by posting notices on site if unknown. The notice states that the horse(s) will be taken, kept for four days, and then ownership passes to the landowner, who may sell, re-home or humanely destroy the animals. The authority may reclaim the costs of doing so from the owner (if known) or through sale of the animals. Most authorities use the services of equine bailiffs for this work.

Fly-grazing is more common in some parts of the country than others, but when action is taken in one area, the problem tends to move rather than disappear if there is not consistent action by all highway authorities. Lack of action by an authority may arise from not having a protocol in place to deal with fly-grazing. It may be necessary to be persistent in complaining about the obstruction, and in encouraging others to also complain. Details of the process for taking action on obstruction are available in BHS Advice on Blocked and difficult to use Bridleways.

Where the highway authority does not have a protocol in place, it may be difficult to identify the officer responsible and to ensure swift action is taken. Where an authority is reluctant to act, the situation is very likely to deteriorate.

Where a highway authority is unused to dealing with fly-grazing, various delays and misunderstandings may arise. The points most beneficial to understand for the welfare of the horses, the reduction of impact on local people and on the authority are:

- A highway is a public place and a tethered horse may present a serious safety risk to the public.
- Tethering on the highway is not illegal, but fly-grazing is unlawful and tethering without intention to graze is unusual.
- The horse or its tether will be an obstruction of part or the whole width of the highway. Obstructing the public highway is a criminal offence ('highway' includes bridleways and byways). Horses preventing use by the public by intimidation (fear of the animal or consequences of passing it) or direct aggressive behaviour are an obstruction.

- If tethered horses are unable to complete a circle, they do not have freedom of movement, which is a welfare issue (tethers need swivels at both ends).
- The landowner is responsible for the welfare of horses on its land, so its vested interest in the highway makes the highway authority liable to undertake frequent visits (several times a day) to check the welfare of horses, which may involve a veterinary surgeon or knowledgeable consultant.
- Adequate welfare visits are more expensive than removing the horse(s).

Authorities need to encourage responsible ownership of horses, which includes castration if appropriate, microchipping and having a passport for every horse.

Police and the public can seize horses but the police have no more power than the public so it is better that the local authority take action as they have more power.

Failing to act encourages more fly-grazing which creates an escalating welfare problem and may result in the area becoming a hotspot for fly-grazing or abandonment, leading to higher costs to resolve, plus the potentially serious effect on the lives of the residents or businesses in the area.

Authorities have the power to act but not a duty unless there is threat to the safety of the public or obstruction of the highway. Therefore it may be necessary to lobby councillors to stimulate the political and managerial will to take action.
